I remember a specific instance in high school when Dylan invited me over to his house and I met his father and we had a few conversations. I can remember Dylan making me tea or something and us running around the house just being silly as per usual. I think Tom was there too. He was telling me in lengthy detail these stories behind some of the beautiful artwork and things around the house that I inquired about. He was always extremely bright and analytical which is why I loved having conversations philosophically and just generally with him. Every interaction I ever had with Dylan was always one of intelligence and humor. Always learning something new. He is very much loved by us all and will be greatly missed. Though his soul and his memory is just as alive as he always was.
